

Greetings, if there is a way to positively affect the publishers, distributors, and authors regarding First Sale for eBooks, I urge you to take it. One of the functional principles of public libraries is to curate and make available older materials. By choosing and maintaining the best of older materials we manage a body of knowledge for the benefit of society. Leasing runs counter to this principle.

I am less concerned by Harper Collins 'pay again after 26 checkouts' than I am about Penguins two year expiration date or Macmillan's one year one. These limitations mean that we should not even invest in books that may be good but not popular enough.
